

words if necessary. In other words, the example of how we live our lives can be at least as important as the words that we speak. There can be many opportunities for us to share our faith and to encourage others. It may be a supportive word at a difficult moment, giving time to someone who comes to us for advice or simply be present and attentive to the person we are speaking to.

I recall someone recently saying "I understand exactly what you mean" which is an ordinary phrase in some ways but also shows that the person is listening very attentively to what is being said to them. Sometimes, as in the case of John the Baptist, our advice may send the person off in a different direction in their lives. In our Gospel today, he encourages Andrew to go to Jesus. This is a very selfless act as John might have preferred to continue to have Andrew's companionship but instead he realised that the time had come for Andrew to move on with his life and he was willing to facilitate that.

Jesus clearly made a big impression on Andrew because we are told that he "stayed with him the rest of that day." Andrew clearly recognised something very important in the person of Jesus and decided to remain with him. Having made this great discovery, Andrew does not keep the news to himself but immediately wants to share it with his brother Peter. We are told that he meets his brother and says to him: "We have found the Messiah". What an extraordinary moment of revelation! Andrew was obviously a man of faith but his first reaction is to share the good news, echoing Mary's decision to visit Elizabeth when she heard the news of the annunciation. As Christians, our duty is to share the good news and not to hide it away or keep it to ourselves.

Let us pray in the coming week that we will be able to share our faith and insights on life with those in need of guidance and support in whatever circumstances we may encounter them.

"We have found the Messiah"

14th January 2018

People often talk about the importance of having a mentor. Someone who will inspire and help us often at an important part of our life's journey.

This may be a family member, perhaps an uncle or aunt. It may be a teacher or work colleague who may have been particularly helpful to us when giving advice about our careers. Or perhaps a priest or nun or lay person who has inspired us on our journey of faith.

I can certainly recall a priest who was extremely supportive and helpful to me when the Permanent Diaconate was first discussed in Ireland over ten years ago now. At the time, people did not know very much about it and some were sceptical about what it might achieve. But I do recall that this particular priest was unfailingly supportive and encouraging from day one and regularly checked in with me to see how things were going as I progressed through the various stages of the programme.

We can see a number of mentors at work in today's readings. Eli is advising Samuel about the meaning of God's call in the first reading and, in our Gospel today, we see John the Baptist directing his disciples to Jesus. Later in the reading, Andrew having found Jesus goes and tells his brother Peter: "We have found the Messiah".

So, here we have three mentors, Eli, John the Baptist and Andrew helping other people on their journey of faith by showing them the way to God. In our lives, we may have opportunities to show Jesus to those we meet in the different circumstances of our lives. Saint Francis of Assisi once said to preach the gospel and to use
